

FLOATING IN SPACE

Ruben Caballero, the Spanish multi-instrumentalist behind FLOATING IN SPACE, returns with Adrift -- his most personal and daring record yet. Known for cinematic, emotionally charged post-rock, Caballero trades some of the ethereal shimmer of past albums for something heavier, more immediate, and profoundly human.

Leading the charge is the single In Flames, out November 20, which hints at the album's raw energy and emotional intensity. Where previous album Liftoff explored journeys through light and darkness, Adrift is about letting go -- drifting without fear of where the current leads. "Adrift is a turning point," Caballero says. "It helped me reconnect with intensity and rediscover that raw energy sometimes lost in more atmospheric work. It represents movement, change and acceptance."

Built on seven-string guitars, lower tunings, and high-gain amps, the album hits hard while keeping the melodic, emotional core that defines Floating In Space. Heavier, more direct, yet introspective, Adrift is visceral and deeply human. "The melodic and emotional essence that has always defined Floating In Space is still there," Caballero notes, "but here everything feels more immediate, more visceral." Written in solitude, every track became a release, a way to channel personal struggles without overthinking. "Sometimes drifting is a way of moving forward, of letting things find their own path," he reflects. "The songs breathe, but they also hit hard."

Expansive yet intimate, melancholic yet resolute, Adrift is an emotional recalibration -- an album that reconnects Floating In Space to the pulse of humanity while retaining the cinematic grandeur that has gained Caballero's work so much respect. Adrift is both an arrival and a surrender, a reminder that even when we drift, we are still moving forward.
